The pirates walked in through the door."First, who didn't do what I asked them to do? Anderson, Hands and you, George! If we are arrested when we return to England, it is because of those people! Second, we have a doctor on the island. He's important because some of us are very ill at the moment. The doctor and I came to an agreement so that he would help us. And the boy? He'll be useful if we need to negotiate. And what about reason three? Well, this is why we didn't follow them!""First, your plans haven't worked. Second, you let Trelawney and his men leave the fort, and we're sure that they have a plan. Third, you wouldn't let us follow them. And fourth, there's the boy!"One of the men was holding a piece of paper, and he nervously walked forward to give it to Silver."Can I have the torch for a minute, so I can read it better?""Don't try your tricks on us," said one of the pirates, called George."I'm still the captain until you tell me why I shouldn't be," said Silver."That's enough, isn't it?""I'll answer each reason," said Silver.he continued, and showed them the treasure map.The pirates, however, looked at it with wonder."That's Flint's map!""Silver's right," said Morgan, and the other pirates agreed.The pirates now seemed happy, except for George.What would Dr Livesy think?"We can tell you," said George.
