

Sediments are unconsolidated (loose) particles of silt, clay, sand and small rock fragments that were created by the weathering and erosion of rock, by chemical precipitation from solution in water or from the secretions of living organisms, and have been transported and redeposited by water, wind or ice