

In 2002, he became stranded on the 35th floor of London's Canary Wharf Tower when rain began to fall. He states, "Perhaps they view their buildings as ugly, these towering structures adorned with glass – the antithesis of natural landscapes. However, for me, they represent urban mountains. I utilize these workplaces and transform them into a realm of wonder. Everywhere I climb, I encounter people who are filled with happiness." Nowadays, he can tackle eighty-story structures, but it's astonishing to note that Alain actually suffers from vertigo – he experiences dizziness at great heights! Alain has conquered over 85 of the world's tallest structures, including the Eiffel Tower, the Empire State Building, and the Petronas Twin Towers in Malaysia. In addition to raising awareness about global issues like climate change, Alain aims to alter people's perception of their surroundings. He dangles from balconies, crawls along ledges, and clings to the edges of glass and concrete. Despite having fallen seven times and enduring numerous broken bones, which have left him partially disabled, Alain remains undeterred. The authorities insist that he refrains from scaling public buildings, but the only element that halts this daredevil is rain. While his nickname may be Spider-Man, he is no superhero – simply an extraordinary individual leading an exceedingly perilous existence
