

Fruits require little to no digestion in the mouth and stomach and are quickly transported to the intestines for further digestion. Furthermore, the acidic conditions caused by fermentation will halt carbohydrate and protein digestion. As a result, bacterial decomposition of the mixed food groups occurs, resulting in the formation of toxins.