

Where energy storage systems can shift electricity consumption from expensive periods of high demand to periods of low electricity cost during low demand, this reduces the risk of solar devaluation on site if tariff structures change over time, with periods of peak demand in the evening when the sun is not shining. This also allows facilities to get the most out of time-of-use pricing and reduce the risk of changing the tariff structure on the cost of electricity.