

Animals such as mice, rats, rabbits and guinea pigs are most commonly used experimental animals for study of different biological activities in health and disease. Proper handling, care and management is an ethical requirement for any experimentation on animals while generating reliable and reproducible experimental data.