

The competitive spirit of modern civilization, Horney wrote, was fertile ground for neuroses, because the emphasis on success and achievement gave people who had a weak self-image the opportunity to greatly compensate by becoming "eminent." She noted, "blind rebellion, blind craving to excel, and a blind need to keep away from others are all forms of dependence