

Caitlin Clark and Angel Reese both make yet more WNBA history. Caitlin Clark and Angel Reese both dominated in college basketball, now the pair keep making history in the WNBA. Clark's Fever (13–15) will face the Minnesota Lynx in its next game, while Reese's Sky (11–16) will play the Connecticut Sun. "Records are meant to be broken...it shows growth and evolution. Can't think of a better player to break it," Penicheiro wrote, while the Fever posted a video of the former WNBA star congratulating Clark, who finished the game with nine assists and 232 total on the season. The record is the latest of a string of achievements from Clark's first WNBA season, where she has already become the first rookie in league history to record a triple-double, and marked another milestone by dishing out 19 assists in a single game. In addition to scoring 23 points, the 22-year-old also recorded her 225th assist which saw her pass Ticha Penicheiro's record for the most assists by a rookie in WNBA history, which was set in 1998. To pass somebody like her, I'm just forever thankful. With the WNBA now back in full-swing after the Olympic break, both Clark and Reese will hope to lead their respective teams into the postseason.
