

Air as a conductor You read that air is an insulator. For a spark or lightning to occur, freely moving charged particles must be formed in air, which is normally neutral. The spark that jumps between your finger and a doorknob after you have rubbed your feet on a carpet discharges you. In the case of lightning, excess charges in the cloud and on the ground exert enough force to temporarily remove electrons from the molecules in the air.