

The main idea of the video is the different models of the doctor–patient relationship. According to the American Medical Association, there are four models to examine: paternalistic, informative, interpretive, and deliberative. To maintain a healthy relationship, doctors should use open–ended questions, display good communication skills, build trust, engage in collaborative decision–making, and attend communication skills workshops. The interpretive model helps patients determine values and priorities for personalized decisions. Patient satisfaction and healthcare systems should also facilitate the doctor–patient partnership. The paternalistic model involves the doctor making decisions for the patient, but it is considered outdated. The informative model allows patients to make autonomous decisions. The deliberative model involves collaboration and shared decision–making. I believe that this relationship is very important and significantly affects the speed of the patient's recovery.
