

The functionality of the prototype-based long-range communication system involves several key components and processes: – Sensors installed along roads such as infrared detect the presence of vehicles and collect traffic data, including the number of cars passing through specific locations. – The system may log timestamped data entries, allowing for trend analysis and historical comparisons over time. – Processed traffic data is stored in a database or other storage solution for historical analysis and reporting purposes.