

This theory relates directly to the practice of patient education as it identifies that an adult actively pursues learning based on a perceived need. This implies that the adult is internally motivated and self-directed in seeking consultation regarding a relevant problem that they are experiencing