

The best-defined causative genetic disorder is alpha-1 antitrypsin deficiency, which is an important cause of emphysema in nonsmokers and markedly increases susceptibility to disease in smokers. More than 30 genetic alleles have been found to be associated with COPD or decline in lung function in selected populations, but none has been shown to be as consequential as alpha-1 antitrypsin