

Furthermore, confidence in the acquisition of knowledge slightly differed between the two batches. These findings question the fact that traditional examinations, as the sole indicator of a student's academic proficiency, are sufficient to accurately determine a student's readiness for university. In this way, CAGs are likely to provide a better insight into a student's proficiency and knowledge; they can be considered as an alternative to traditional final examinations.