

In programming, "factoring" generally refers to the process of breaking down complex code or a large problem into smaller, more manageable parts. This is similar to factoring in mathematics, where you break down larger numbers into their prime factors. In the context of software development, factoring can take various forms, but it usually revolves around simplifying, modularizing, or refactoring code.