

African forest peoples live in bands that range in size from 15–70 people depending largely on the availability of game, trading relationships with outside communities, the prevalence of disease, and the extent of forest area. Their nomadic lifestyle allows the group to move in response to resource availability.