

Researchers, especially quantitative researchers, find it useful to think in terms of variables. The researcher could use a standardized achievement test, a teacher-made test, grades in science class, or evaluations of completed science projects. In a study concerned with the relation of vocabulary level to science achievement among eighth-graders, the variables of interest are the measures of vocabulary and the measures of science achievement. Researchers study variables and the relationships that exist among variables.