This is because they are involved in the cardboard recycling manufacturing venture. Government agencies: Since they might have to offer assistance, offer incentives, or enforce laws pertaining to cardboard recycling, local and federal government organizations in charge of waste management and environmental regulations would be stakeholders. Consumers: People and households who frequently use and discard cardboard packaging are stakeholders because their lives are directly affected by the accessibility and availability of cardboard waste recycling facilities. Environmental organizations: As they would support and advocate for the project to reduce waste and promote recycling, nonprofits that are focused on environmental conservation and sustainability would be stakeholders.
