

Survey research (also called descriptive research) uses instruments such as questionnaires and interviews to gather information from groups of individuals. For example, an educational researcher might ask a group of parents about what kind of sex education program, if any, they believe schools should provide for middle school students. Researchers in education and the social sciences use surveys widely. We discuss surveys in Chapter 14