

The greater the impact on culture and norms of a change program, the greater the amount of resistance that will probably emerge. The members themselves define what the norms are, as well as enforce individual behavior to conform to the norms. Organizations will have subcultures formed around smaller work- or social-groups. Because norms generally have strong support from the group, they cannot easily be changed.