

People who see a mistake as a wake-up call and work to identify what went wrong end up faring better than those who just accept that they messed up. Making mistakes allows us the opportunity to pay more attention and incorporate new information that will likely improve our learning and performance