

In conclusion, while plastic surgery can be medically necessary in certain cases, Islam strongly discourages cosmetic procedures for purely aesthetic purposes. Cosmetic surgery, when performed without a medical need, is considered impermissible (haram) by most Islamic scholars, as it contradicts the principles of humility, responsible use of wealth, and the protection of one's health. In addition to the health risks and financial burdens associated with cosmetic surgery, it fosters a culture of vanity and materialism that shifts focus from spiritual growth and the cultivation of inner beauty. Ultimately, true beauty in Islam is reflected through one's actions, faith, and connection to Allah, rather than the pursuit of unattainable beauty standards. The religion emphasizes modesty, contentment with one's natural appearance, and gratitude toward Allah's creation. Islam encourages individuals to accept their natural form, prioritize personal development, and value qualities such as kindness and character over physical appearance.
