

English neoclassical criticism has Dryden at the beginning, Pope in the middle, and Samuel Johnson at the end. Dryden at the beginning and Johnson at the end of the period are subject to influences which make the dogmatism of Pope's Essay on Criticism less easy for them to embrace. But, Johnson continues, this general knowledge of nature is only half of the poet's task. Of the three, Pope is the strictest.