

In many remote areas, people still have to travel long distances to access healthcare services. To achieve this, more healthcare clinics should be built in remote areas, reducing the need for long travel. Building more clinics, using mobile units, and offering online consultations could make healthcare more accessible. Additionally, mobile health units could visit these areas regularly to provide medical services. Another great solution is using technology, such as telemedicine, where patients can consult doctors online. Local healthcare workers could also be trained to provide more care in these areas.