

are offered for native speakers who need to conduct business with people in different countries! characteristics that make one an effective communicator across cultures, over and above acquiring a prestigious native speaker accent and structurally accurate use of the language. As more and more people use English as a common medium to communicate with people from other countries, they affect the language and develop their own variety in terms of accent, vocabulary, and other features. So, for a change, native speakers have to attend courses that will familiarize them with new varieties of their language and help them develop the skills required to understand the people they communicate with. Naturally, intercultural communication and its requirements are a very important part of such courses and a prerequisite for successful communication with members of different cultures. So, maybe, the first thing to consider is the reason why we learn the language and what we intend to do with it. English as an international medium of communication is an evolving variety that is affected by the speakers of the language, whether they happen to be native or non- native. There is a multitude of regional varieties within
