

Schools of economic thought are groups of thinkers sharing a common understanding of how economies function. The Classical School, which emerged during the Industrial Revolution, played a key role in transforming the field of economics