

CASE STUDIES A case study is a type of ethnographic research study that focuses on a single unit, such as one individual, one group, one organization, or one program. Case studies use multiple methods, such as interviews, observation, and archives, to gather data. Education and psychology researchers have used the case study widely.