In recent years, the freedom of movement between countries has expanded, allowing more people to live abroad than ever before.While some argue that it brings challenges, I believe that increased freedom of movement offers significant advantages for host countries.In addition, migrants often bring specialised skills and qualifications that strengthen the workforce and improve productivity.Their presence can also stimulate economic growth, as they pay taxes, rent homes, start businesses, and spend money in local markets, all of which support the host country's financial stability.In conclusion, although increased movement of people across borders may present some challenges, the advantages for host countries are substantial.Economic growth, cultural enrichment, and the strengthening of essential services are all benefits that make the presence of foreign residents highly valuable.
