

The article examines Pakistan's laws addressing women's protection from gender-based violence and their effectiveness, highlighting challenges such as economic dependency, cultural and societal outlooks, weak enforcement, and unreported instances of violence. Further research supports harmonizing the formal legal system with traditional judicial systems and economic empowerment for women to comply with national laws. Despite progress, the system still hinders the proper implementation of legislative frameworks for women's security.