

Many pathogenic micro-organisms (bacteria, molds and viruses) can contaminate foods during various stages of their handling, between production and consumption. Mass production of food, introduction of new technologies in the processing and storage of food, changes in food consumption patterns, and increased import of food from other countries have increased the chances of large outbreaks as well as the introduction of new pathogens.