

The extent of groundwater pollution is determined by several factors: The number, intensity, or strength of NPS contamination activities within a well or spring's source area. Many low-grade NPS pollution sources could have an effect equivalent to a few more severe NPS pollution sources when added together (Harter, 2003). The pace at which water percolates from the surface to the earth