

Based on the given parameters, the patient is experiencing respiratory alkalosis. This hyperventilation results in decreased levels of carbon dioxide in the blood, leading to respiratory alkalosis. It is important for the patient to acclimate to the high altitude gradually and to ensure adequate oxygen intake to prevent further respiratory alkalosis and its potential complications.