

When it comes to making friends, there are many different kinds of friendship that exist. Furthermore, it cannot be ignored that time spent with close friends is often more meaningful and enjoyable than time spent with a group of casual acquaintances. While people often disagree over which of these kinds of friendship is the most valuable, I believe that the benefits of having one or two really close friends to be much more beneficial. This means that close friends can always rely on finding help and support when they need it. On the other hand, having a large group of friends means that everyone has to divide their time and will not always be there for one other. Close friends, on the other hand, are able to discuss many things in greater depth, which helps to build a more meaningful bond between them. Another factor that must be taken into consideration is how likely a friendship is to last the test of time. Because the relationship between casual acquaintances is not as strong, these friendships are more likely to be lost if one person moves away or simply becomes too busy with something else. In large groups, where people do not know each other very well, the conversation often remains at the level of 'small talk', which many find boring.