

Wood is strongest along the alignment parallel to its grain. This can occur when the tree itself has a spiral grain, or due to improper processing of the lumber. This rule was enacted because bats with non-straight grains can fail dangerously (Links to an external site.) Processed boards don't always have a straight grain, however