

Animals suffered at the hands of man in that they were gradually but systematically destroyed by Europeans to make way for agricultural land to provide food for a fast-growing population. Twentieth-century farmers started to use pesticides, poisoning the creatures on which so many of the remaining larger animals depended. Throughout all this, the rich were hunting, shooting and fishing for sport. Looking back, one is surprised that modern Europe has any wildlife left at all