

Linguistics is the scientific study of language. It may focus on the relationships between individual languages or on the universal characteristics of all languages. The discipline of linguistics also involves the analysis of the sociological and psychological aspects of communication.