

- o The study emphasizes that early clinical placements significantly enhance first-year nursing students' empathy and professional identity, highlighting the need for nursing education to incorporate practical experiences earlier in the curriculum to foster deeper understanding and commitment to the profession. Quantitative surveys assessed empathy changes in nursing students pre- and post-clinical placement, while qualitative diaries explored their professional identity development