

Polarity and size of particles The nature of the particles making up a gas also affects how ideally the gas behaves. Also, the particles of gases composed of larger nonpolar molecules, such as butane (CH₄), occupy more actual volume than an equal number of smaller gas particles in gases such as helium (He).