

When economic crisis hits and companies focus on cutting costs—or on their very survival— they slash hiring. But if history is any guide, in the first few months after the upheaval subsides, hiring quickly becomes a front-burner issue