

Researchers have found that inedible butterfly species with similar colour patterns also have similar flight habits, which serve as warning signals to predators. Distantly related butterflies in the same colour pattern mimicry group have more similar flight behavior than closely related species with different warning coloration