

Bacteria are typically unicellular but often form specialized surface-attached communities called biofilms in nature. As cells multiply, they form microcolonies and communicate through quorum sensing, where chemical signals trigger behavioral changes once a population threshold is reached. Biofilm formation begins when environmental signals induce genetic changes in planktonic cells, prompting them to attach to surfaces using appendages like flagella and pili.