

This line shows Napoleon's growing control and his desire to limit the animals' involvement in decision-making. By announcing that these meetings would end, Napoleon is taking away the animals' right to participate in their own governance. This move also shows how Napoleon is becoming more like the human rulers the animals initially rebelled against. Instead of allowing the animals to discuss matters and make decisions, Napoleon wants to centralize power and make decisions on his own, without anyone questioning him.