

There is no single answer to this question, both because there appears to be considerable individual variation among speakers, and because there are very complex factors which must be taken into account. Ervin and Osgood (1954; following Weinreich 1953) suggested a three-way possibility for how languages relate in an individual's mind, which are called coordinate, compound, and subordinate bilingualism