

Stomach contents include vomit, gastric aspirate, and stomach washings; it is critical to get the initial sample of washings because following samples may be quite dilute. Large levels of poison may be detected if obtained soon after intake, although metabolites, which can confuse several tests, are usually lacking.