

I do not think that there is a device more wonderful than a computer. Not only that, but it is the key to electronic civilization because through it we are able to store the cultures of all nations and select from them what is useful to us in the field in which we work in it. In the field of writing and nature, for example, we are able to produce what we cannot produce, and in the field of education, the computer provides us with everything that pleases our minds in the fields in which we need information. This innovation, which has become widespread on a global scale, contributes to the development of modern technology of which it is a part. By other means
