

Evidence for chemical intra–species communication in insects is reviewed, with emphasis on those studies where known organic compounds were involved. These chemicals carrying the signal are known as pheromones. There are two distinct types of pheromones, releasers and primers