

Connective tissue binds organs together, provides support and protection, fills spaces, produces blood cells, and stores fat. As a rule, connective tissue cells are widely separated by a matrix, consisting of a noncellular material that varies in consistency from solid to semifluid to fluid. White collagen fibers contain collagen, a protein that gives them flexibility and strength. The matrix may have fibers of three possible types.