

School and University: What's the Difference? School and university are two important stages in our education. Students can choose their major, which is a subject they want to specialize in. Instead of having a fixed schedule, students create their own timetable by choosing classes that fit their interests and goals. School is more structured and guided, while university offers more freedom and requires more responsibility. It's divided into different levels: primary, middle, and high school. The classes are often larger, and there is less direct supervision from teachers, who are called professors. In summary, while both school and university are essential parts of our education, they are very different experiences. The environment is structured, with rules and a lot of supervision. Unlike school, university offers more freedom and responsibility.
