

According to Holman (1980: 185), Figurative language is when words are purposefully used in a different way than they normally would be in order to communicate something more vividly, to draw the reader into a picture, to draw an analogy, or to find parallels between seemingly unrelated topics