There is, therefore, a strong case for exploring activity theory in analyzing technology-induced change.Closely related is Mwanza's (2002) study, which was designed to analyze work practices in relation to identifying design requirements for computer-assisted learning.